“ Time is precious and sometimes it's hard to say farewells, goodbyes, and see you later. Last Friday afternoon, I said my farewells and goodbyes to one influential woman in our family's life, my Lola. Without her, my father along with his siblings would not be where they are today. Although she was not born to several riches or assets so to speak, she possessed something greater than riches, which are several family members who love her. Lola, Lolo's, and Verna's memory will remain in our hearts forever and it will continue to enlighten us with the conclusion that time and lives are precious gifts given to us from God. We love you Lola and please continue to watch over your family here on Earth!

“ I don't really have photos with Lola. What I have are memories of times I spent with her walking/riding a bus to the mall with my other grand folks, conversating about life in general, and taking care of her. According to her, I was her bestfriend. She was always nice to me. When I was in Philippines, she sent me fancy dresses, shoes, jewelries, and money. When I came in the US, she still handed me money here and there. She got agitated when I didn't wanna accept her money. Anyway, the last time Lola slept in her own bed was because she wanted me to sleep next to her. The last time I visited her when she was able to move around a little over a month ago, she fed me literally like a little baby. Last, but not the least, Lola's words to me that I will always remember. She once told me, translated in English, "Stop doing bad things because I know that you are a very good kid because our neighbors in Cebu told me so. Don't follow what a couple of your cousins are doing just because you stepped foot on foreign soil. Don't give your parents problems."

“ She came over on the weekends, and we watched after her. I never really knew her, and wish I could go back in time to have an interview of her. That way, I would know some things about her. Though the thing I really remembered about her was on her birthday when I gave her a picture of me, then she gave me a hug. <3 - Charmai
